MUCHNIC From Gorky to Pasternak 10 This individualist attitude, variously manifested, not only in Symbolism itself but in its several offshoots—Acmeism, Futurism, Formalism, as well as in the entirely personal nightmares of such writers as Leonid Andreyev—was to clash most sharply with the dogma of Soviet art.

acorn ('eɪkɔ:n). Forms: 1 æcern, æcirn, (2–3 ? akern); 4–7 akern, (4 hakern); 4 pl. acres, atcherne; 4–5 acharn(è; 4–6 achorn(e, 5 akerne, ackerne, accharne, acorun, accorne, hockorn; 5–7 acorne, oke-corne; 6 akecorne, okehorne, acquorn, eykorn; 6–7 akehorne, akorne, acron; 7 oke-corn, akorn; 6– acorn. [The formal history of this word has been much perverted by 'popular etymology.' OE. æcern neut., pl. æcernu, is cogn. w. ON. akarn neut. (Dan. agern, Norw. aakorn), Du. aker 'acorn,' OHG. ackeran masc. and neut. (mod.G. ecker, pl. eckern) 'oak or beech mast,' Goth. akran 'fruit,' prob. a deriv. of Goth. akr-s, ON. akr, OE. æcer 'field,' orig. 'open unenclosed country, the plain.' Hence akran appears to have been originally 'fruit of the unenclosed land, natural produce of the forest,' mast of oak, beech, etc., as in HG., extended in Gothic to 'fruit' generally, and gradually confined in Low G., Scand., and Eng., to the most important forest produce, the mast of the oak. (See Grimm, under Ackeran and Ecker.) In Ælfric's Genesis xliv. 11, it had perhaps still the wider sense, a reminiscence of which also remains in the ME. akernes of okes. Along with this restriction of application, there arose a tendency to find in the name some connexion with oak, OE. ác, north. ake, aik. Hence the 15th and 16th c. refashionings akecorn, oke-corn, ake-horn, oke-horn, with many pseudo-etymological and imperfectly phonetic variants. Of these the 17th c. literary acron seems to simulate the Gr. ἄκρον top, point, peak. The normal mod. repr. of OE. æcern would be akern, akren, or ? atchern as already in 4; the actual acorn is due to the 16th c. fancy that the word corn formed part of the name.]

3. Grammar. a. properly, An epithet of Voice in verbs used transitively; opposed to Passive (and, in some languages, to Reflexive or Middle). That form of the verb in which the action asserted by it is viewed as a characteristic or attribute of the thing whence it issues, as opposed to the Passive Voice in which the action is viewed as an attribute of the thing towards which it is directed; or, that form of the verb in which the logical subject of the action is made by the speaker the grammatical subject of his assertion, as shown by the verb's agreement with it in inflections, by position, or otherwise. This being (in Aryan Languages) the simple or original form, verbs used intransitively naturally have no other, and are said to have the Active Voice only.

b. Less correctly, said of verbs themselves; in two senses. 1. Applied to verbs which assert that the subject acts upon or affects something else, as distinguished from Passive Verbs, or such as assert of the subject that it is acted on by something or suffers the action, and Neuter Verbs which assert an action or state that has neither character. 2. Applied to all verbs that assert action as distinct from mere existence or state; in this sense Active Verbs are divided into Active Transitive, in which the action passes over to or affects an object, as kill (corresponding to the Active of 1), and Active Intransitive, in which the action does not affect an object, as rise (forming part of the Neuter verbs of 1), Neuter in this nomenclature being restricted to verbs of existence or state, as be, sit.

Both of these uses of the word are etymologically defensible, but both are inconvenient: the distinction between action and state is not always clear, and above all is one of things, not of assertions about them; that of action and passion is merely that of two ways of viewing and asserting the same action; while the passing over of an action to an object or the contrary is better expressed by Transitive and Intransitive, and is moreover not a division of verbs, but of the constructions of each verb separately, the great majority of verbs in Eng. having both constructions.

1. A philosophical theory which assumes the objective reality and active existence of everything.

1907 W. R. B. GIBSON Eucken's Philos. af Life (ed. 2) App. 170 Activism has affinities with Pragmatism, especially on its negative side. 1920 H. L. ENO Activism x. 176 Activism is .. essentially realistic. It assumes the 'objective' validity and 'real' being of entities and relations, as well as the fundamental relational complexes of space, time, number, and change.

2. A doctrine or policy of advocating energetic action.

Hence activist ('æktɪvɪst), an advocate of activism in either sense; also attrib. (passing into a.) = acti'vistic a.

1. a. The state of being active; the exertion of energy, action.

b. spec. in Physics, = RADIOACTIVITY; the disintegration rate of a radioactive substance.

Physics* iii. 21 The disintegration rate .. is known as the activity of the sample... The unit of activity is the curie, which is the rate at which 1 g of radium decays.

c. The degree to which a substance, spec. an enzyme, exhibits its characteristic property.

1898 B. MOORE in E. A. Schäfer Text-bk. Physiol. I. 322 The activity of a diastatic enzyme can be most accurately estimated by determining the amount of sugar (maltose) formed under given conditions in a given time by a given volume of the solution, acting on a measured volume of a standard solution of starch mucilage. 1921 Jrnl. Soc. Chem. Industry (Trans.) XL. 230/2 In the first half of the nineteenth century .. French chemists had succeeded in increasing the activity of animal and vegetable chars. 1929 Prac. R. Chem. (ed. 4) II. 317/1 The outstanding property of active charcoals is their adsorptive activity towards vapours, gases, and dissolved substances... Activity is expressed in terms of adsorptive capacity which is measured for any given substance by the quantity absorbed under specified conditions. 1969 T. E. BARMAN Enzyme Handbk. I. 5 There are various ways of expressing the catalytic efficiency of an enzyme. Of these molecular activity (the number of molecules of substrate transformed per minute per molecule of enzyme) requires an accurate knowledge of the molecular weight of the enzyme and catalytic centre activity (the number of molecules of substrate transformed per minute per catalytic centre) an accurate knowledge of active site concentrations. The quantity specific activity, however, merely requires the weight of enzyme required to produce a certain activity. Thus, the specific activity of an enzyme is defined as units per mg of enzyme protein. One unit .. is that amount of enzyme which will catalyze the transformation of one micromole of substrate per minute under standard conditions. 1976 Nature 16 Sept. 251/1 The enzyme had a specific activity of about 17 μmol ATP hydrolysed per mg protein min^{-1} at 37° C.

d. Physical Chem. A thermodynamic quantity which is a measure of the effective concentration of a substance in a system which departs from ideal behaviour, being defined as an exponential function of chemical potential and reciprocal temperature.

1907 G. N. LEWIS in Proc. Amer. Acad. Arts & Sci. XLIII. 262 We shall find it desirable to introduce besides the fugacity .. another quantity which has the dimensions of concentration. This quantity we will call the activity. 1948 GLASSTONE Textbk. Physical Chem. (ed. 2) ix. 687 The simplest method for evaluating the activity of a solvent is by determination of vapour pressure. 1975 Nature 2 Oct. 398/1 Most microorganisms .. are often able to grow .. in the presence of environmental solutes sufficiently high to reduce the water activity to values as low as 0·86. 1978 P. W. ATKINS Physical Chem. 20 As the concentration increases positive cations tend to congregate in the vicinity of the negative anions, and vice versa... Instead of talking in terms of the concentration of ions it then becomes more significant to talk in terms of their effective concentration, or activity.

-acy, suffix of sbs. [a branch of the wider suffix -CY, a virtual compound of -Y, ME. -ye, -ie, Fr. -ie, L. -ia, with preceding t or c, though the L. was rather -ci + a, -ti + a, than -c + ia, -t + ia.] 1. ad. L. -āci-a, forming sbs. of quality on adjs. in -āci-, as fall- deceive, fall-āci- deceitful, fallāci-a deceitfulness, 'fallacy'; so 'contumacy, efficacy.' The corresponding Fr. words are in -ace; -acy is entirely of Eng. formation, analogous to other endings in -Y, for L. -ia; cf. -NCE and -NCY. A parallel suffix is the more frequent -ACI-TY, as in rapacity; and an equivalent to both -ACIOUS-NESS, as in rapaciousness, fallaciousness. 2. representing or imitating L. -āt-i-a, in med.L. often written -ācia, OFr. -acie, forming sbs. of quality, state, or condition, on nouns in -āt- (nom. -ās), being only a section of the sbs. in -tia from nouns in -t-, -ti-, in which the suffix was properly -a, and the i either part of the stem or connective, cf. inerti-a, infant(i-a, mīlit-i-a. Thus: late L. abbāt-, abbāt-ia 'abbacy', L. prīmāt-, med.L. prīmātia, Fr. primatie, 'primacy'; L. optimāt-, Fr. optimatie, 'optimacy'; L. diplōmat-, Fr. diplomatie, 'diplomacy'; late L. pāpāt- (nom. pāpās = pāpa) Anglo-L. pāpātia (= pāpātus) 'papacy.' Imitation of primacy has given 'supremacy,' Fr. suprématie. 3. repr. med.L. -ātia, forming sbs. of state on nouns in -āt-us; cf. cl. L. -tia from -tus, in grāt-ia, minūt-ia, molest-ia, etc. Thus, (perhaps due in part to form-association with abbātia, prīmātia, pāpātia,) med.L. advocātia, prælātia, lēgātia, 'advocacy, prelacy, legacy,' f. advocātus, prælāt-us, legāt-us; whence without any L. precedent, 'curacy, confederacy, magistracy,' on other words in L. -ātus or Eng. -ate. Also extended to adjs., as accurate, alternate, whence 'accuracy, alternacy' = accurate-ness, alternate-ness. So 'degeneracy, delicacy, effeminacy, intimacy, intricacy, inveteracy, legitimacy, obstinacy, privacy, profligacy, subordinacy,' etc. The cl. L. forms answering to these, when f. pples., were in -ātiō(nem), as accūrātio, obstinātio, prælātio, lēgātio: hence -ātio has been englished as -acy in other words where no Eng. -ate exists, as conspīrātio, procūrātio 'conspiracy, procuracy.' Of others the proper L. form was -ātus (4th decl.) as pāpātus, magistrātus: hence in other words this has given Eng. -acy, as episcopātus, cælibātus, 'episcopacy, celibacy.' Lunacy has been formed to match lunatic, after the relation of prelacy, diplomacy, to prelatic, diplomatic. It thus appears that -acy f. -ātus, -ate, is almost entirely analogical and of Eng. formation. 4. repr. Gr. sbs. of state in -άτεια, f. nouns in -ατης, or vbs. in -ατεύειν; as πειρᾱτής, L. pīrāta, pirate, πειρατεύ-ειν to pirate, πειράτεια, Anglo-L. pīrātīa, 'piracy,' identified with L. forms like legātīa 'legacy' above. Also in -cracy, Gr. sbs. in -κρατία, L. -cratia, Fr. -cratie, as 'aristocracy'; see -CRACY.

ad-, pref. 1. repr. L. ad prep. 'to,' cogn. w. Teut. at, frequent in comp. with sense of motion or direction to, reduction or change into, addition, adherence, increase, or simple intensification, as ad-ventus, ad-versus, ad-ditus, ad-albātus, ad-ministrāre, ad-augēre. Before the consonants c, f, g, l, n, p, q, r, s, t, ad- was in later L. assimilated, as ac-, af-, ag-, al-, an, ap-, ac-, ar-, as-, at-; and before sc, sp, st it was reduced to a- (a-scendere, a-strictus, a-spirāre). It remained before vowels, and the consonants d, h, j, m, v. It was probably assimilated before b, in ab-breviāre, for ad-breviāre, cf. al-leviāre, attenuāre, accurtāre. In OFr. ad- was reduced to a- in all cases where its character as a prefix was recognized, even before vowels, as adōrāre, aörer, adornāre, aörner, adæstimāre, aesmier. But in the 14th c. the written forms began to be artificially refashioned after L., this being in words like alouer allouer, anoncer annoncer, atendre attendre, only an artificial spelling, but resulting, in such as aörer adorer, ajoint adjoint, in a real change of sound. In 15th c. this fashion spread to England, where the words had originally been adopted in their OFr. forms, and was here carried out far more rigorously, attacking also words that remained unchanged in Fr., or in which the pedantic form was again rejected, as a-dresser ad-dress, a-vertissement ad-vertisement, a-vouerie ad-vowry. All words subsequently formed in Fr. and adopted in Eng., or formed in Eng. on L. words, or according to L. analogies, follow L. spelling. A very recent use of ad-, unknown to L., is to employ it in contrast to ab- in pairs like ad-oral, ab-oral, situated at the mouth, and away from the mouth.

2. While the refashioning of words in OFr. a- was going on in 16th c., mechanical imitation or pedantic assumption extended ad- and its variants to many words in which a- had quite a different origin, as L. ab, OFr. en (an), es, re, OE. a (ar), on, æt, etc.; as in a(d)vance Fr. avancer L. ab-anteāre, a(d)debted OFr. endetté, a(c)cloy OFr. encloyer L. inclāvāre, admerveyl OFr. esmerveiller, a(f)fray OFr. esfreyer, a(f)force OFr. esforcer L. exfortiare*, a(c)curse ME. a-curse, a(l)lay OE. a-lecȝan, a(c)know(ledge OE. on-cnawan, a(d)blast OE. onblæstan, a(d)dight OE. a-dihtan, ȝe-dihtan, a(d)miral Arab. amīr-al-. New eompounds of native words with prefix a- were also falsely written ad-, as a(d)deem, a(d)doom. In most of these words the perversion went no farther than the spelling, but in some, as a(d)vance, a(d)miral, it has distorted the spoken word.

Gr. -άδ-α (nom. -άς) forming, a. Collective numerals, as μονάς unity, monad, so dyad, triad, tetrad, pentad (especially used to class ehemical elements or radicals according to the number of their combining units); hebdomad, chiliad, myriad, etc.; also perissad, Olympiad; decade retains final e from Fr. b. Feminine patronymics (in which it is a phonetic variant of -id), in proper names of females and districts, as Dryad, Naiad, Troad; often in pl. as Pleiad-es, Hyad-es, Cyclad-es. adamant ('ædəmənt), sb. and adj. Also 4–5 adamaunt, -aund, ademaunt, -and; atha-, attha-, atthe-, attemant, -maunt, 5 admont, 6 adamounde. [a. literary OFr. adamaunt, ademaunt, ad. L. adamant-em (nom. adamas), a. Gr. ἀδάμας, ἀδάμαντ-α, orig. adj. = invincible (f. ἀ not + δαμά-ω I tame), afterwards a name of the hardest metal, prob. steel; also applied by Theophrastus to the hardest crystalline gem then known, the emery-stone of Naxos, 'an amorphous form of corundum.' In L. poetically for the hardest iron or steel, or anything very hard and indestructible; also, with Pliny, the name of a transparent crystalline gem of the hexahedral system, apparently corundum or white sapphire, but extended and at length transferred to the still harder DIAMOND (q.v.) after this became known in the West. The early med.L. writers apparently explaining the word from adamā-re 'to take a liking to, have an attraction for,' took the lapidem adamantem for the loadstone or magnet (an ore of iron, and thus also associated with the ancient metallic sense); and with this confusion the word passed into the modern languages. In OE. it occurs as aðamans, from med.L.; and in 13th c. as adamantines stan, a transl. of lapis adamantinus, with the adj. mistaken for a sb. in apposition to lapis, and so englished as stone of adamantin. In the current form it is a 14th c. adoption of the literary Fr. adamaunt, ademaunt, adapted from the L. in place of the popular form aïmant (:—late L. adimantem*, cf. Pr. adiman, aziman, ayman, Sp. iman) loadstone, also found in Eng.; see AYMONT. Diamant arose as a variant of adamant or adimant; see DIAMOND.]

Name of an alleged rock or mineral, as to which vague, contradictory, and fabulous notions long prevailed. The properties ascribed to it show a confusion of ideas between the diamond (or other hard gems) and the loadstone or magnet, though by writers affecting better information, it was distinguished from one or other, or from both. The confusion with the loadstone ceased with the 17th c., and the word was then often used by scientific writers as a synonym of DIAMOND. In modern use it is only a poetical or rhetorical name for the embodiment of surpassing hardness; that which is impregnable to any application of force.

The native Fr. form of this suff. is -ée, as in entrée, acolée; -ade appeared first in the adaptation of Provençal words in -ada, as ballade, Pr. ballada, and became established as the reg. form in which Pr., Sp. or Pg. words in -ada, or their It. cognates in -ata, were adapted in Fr. In some cases these supplanted the native Fr. forms as accolade, ad. It. accollata, for OFr. acolee; in mod.Fr. -ade has become a living suffix, on which new words are formed, as gasconnade, cannonade, fusillade. From Fr., words in -ade have been adopted in Eng., without change (exc. that the early ballade, salade, have become ballad, salad) as in accolade, ambassade, ambuscade, arcade, balustrade, bastonnade, brigade, cannonade, cascade, cavalcade, comrade, crusade, enfilade, escalade, esplanade, fanfaronnade, lemonade, marmalade, masquerade, palisade, parade, rodomontade, serenade, tirade. In imitation of these some have been formed in Eng. itself, as blockade, gingerade, orangeade. The sense is analogous to the pa. pple., and to Eng. sbs., in -ate, as acetate, mandate, syndicate; hence a. An action done; as in blockade, cannonade, fusillade, crusade, parade, tirade. b. The body concerned in an action or process; as in ambuscade, ambassade, brigade, cavalcade, comrade. c. The product of an action, and, by extension, that of any process or raw material; as in arcade, colonnade, masquerade, lemonade, marmalade, pomade.

1889 T. CRAIG Treat. Linear Differential Equations I. xiii. 471 When Chapter I was written.. I had not seen Forsyth's memoir, and had not been able to find an adopted English term for Lagrange's 'équation adjointe', so I used the word adjunct, suggested by the German 'adjungirte', and not unlike the French 'adjointe'. BÔCHER *Introd. J. JONES Game Theory iii. 145 If we define the adjoint of M by $\mathrm{adj}M = (A_{ij})^T$ if $r > 1$, $\mathrm{adj}M = 1$ if $r = 1$, then for all square matrices M we have $M\mathrm{adj}M = (\det M)I$, where I is the identity matrix.

B. adj. Math. Of a matrix: equal to the transpose of the cofactors (or in quantum mechanics, of the complex conjugate) of a given square matrix. Of a differential equation: related to a given differential equation in such a way that its solutions are integrating factors and its integrating factors solutions of the given equation. Of a transformation or operator: (see quot. 1959). Generally, pertaining to adjoint quantities or their relationships.

Also 3 admirald, 5 amireld; 4 ameraunt, 7 admirant. [a. OFr., ad. Arab. directly, or through med.L. or some other Rom. lang. The Arabic amīr commander, (f. amara, to command, order,) commonly Englished AMEER, EMIR, occurs in many titles followed by -al- '(of) the,' as in amīr-al-umarā ruler of rulers, amīr-al-mā commander of the water, amīr-al-bahr, commander of the sea, the earliest of which is amīr-al-mūminīn commander of the faithful, assumed by the Caliph Omar, and Latinized in many forms by the early chroniclers (see Amirmumnes in Du Cange). As amīr is constantly followed by -al- in all such titles, amīr-al- was naturally assumed by Christian writers as a substantive word, and variously Latinized as amīr-ālis, -allus, -ālius, -ārius, OFr. amiral, -ail, -aill, -ayl, Pr. amirau, amirar, amiralh, Pg. amiralh, It. amiraglio. But as is usual with foreign words, popular etymology was soon at work on these original forms, assimilating them to more familiar words, (1) by treating the am- as = Fr. and Pr. am-:—L. adm-, and refashioning it accordingly as med.L. admir-ālis, -allus, -ālius, -ārius, OFr. admiral, -ail; (2) by assimilating it to other Arabic words in al- (which prob. began in Spain) as med.L. almirallus, OSp. almiralle, almirage, It. almiraglio, OFr. almiral, -ail; (3) by assimilating the ending to familiar Teutonic or Romance suffixes, as med.L. amir-aldus, OFr. amiralt, -ault, -aut (after names like Reginald), Sp. almirante (? after imperante), OFr. amirant, admirant; (4) by confusing the refashioned forms in adm- with derivatives of L. admīrāri to wonder at, whence med.L. admīrābilis ('Rex Africæ qui dicitur vulgariter admirabilis mundi'), admīrandus, admīrātus (these again with the initial variations am-, amm-, alm-), whence Pr. amiratz, OFr. amiret, amiré, amirauble, amirafle, amirand, etc., etc. In Eng. the chief form represents OFr. amiral, -ayl, reduced in 16th c. by phonetic gradation to amrel, a pronunciation still common with sailors. But the refashioned admirale, -ail occurs as early as 1205, and became regular after 1500 as the literary form. Variants in -ald, -aunt, after med.L. amiraldus, and OFr. amirant, are also found in ME. As in the other languages the original meaning was 'Emir, Saracen commander, ruler under the Caliph or Sultan'; the modern maritime use is due to the office of amīr-al-bahr or amīr-al-mā 'Ameer of the sea' (Sp. almirante de la mar), ereated by the Arabs in Spain and Sicily, continued by the Christian kings of Sicily, and adopted successively by the Genoese, French, and English under Edward III as 'Amyrel of the Se,' or 'admyrall of the navy.' After the original use became obsolete about 1500, admiral was used in the naval sense, without any qualification, as an English title.]

ado (ə'du:), sb., properly v. inf. = at do, which was the fuller form. [In Norse at is the prep. used with the inf. = Eng. to; see A- pref. 5. Hence in northern Eng., as still used in north Lanc. and Westm. 'a bit o' summat at eat.' Ado is thus a northern dialect form for to do, which has in certain phrases, and as a sb., passed into general use.]

1. pres. inf. To do; in northern writers in all constructions; in others only after have, in phrase to have ado. (Cf. Fr. avoir affaire, orig. avoir à faire to have a-do, or to do.)

¶ Hence through such phrases as much ado, little ado, more ado, by taking the adverbs as adjs. qualifying ado the latter was viewed as a sb., and so construed in a great ado, any ado,

etc. The transition may be seen in the following quotations, in the first of which ado is still the inf., in the second the sb., in the third it may be either.

advert (æd'vɜːt), v. Also 4–6 auerte, avert(e. [a. Fr. avert-ir:—late L. advertē-re for cl. L. advertĕre to turn to, also (sc. animum) to turn the attention of oneself or another to, to remark, admonish; f. ad to + vertĕre to turn. L. āvertere to turn away, AVERT, also made OFr. avertir, which had thus all the senses 'turn to, turn away, remark, call attention.' In 14–16th c. avertir, when answering to L. advertere, was often written advertir; and, since Caxton, advert and avert have been distinguished in Eng. Mod.Fr. has avertir (Palsg. and Cotgr. advertir) only in the sense of 'call the attention of another, admonish' (one of the senses of L. advertere). The lengthened stem of this, a(d)vertiss-, has given Eng. ADVERTISE, orig. a synonym of advert, but subseq. differentiated, so that advert retains the sense of 'turn one's own attention,' advertise that of 'direct the attention of others.' Advert, advertise, avert, are thus all immediately from OFr. avertir, avertiss-ant.] æ (usually written as a digraph or ligature, but also, and in the earliest times, separately ae) was in OE. the symbol of a simple vowel, intermediate between a and e. When short, as in glæd, fæder, it represented orig. Teut. short a, and had the power of modern Eng. a. in man, glad; when long, as in sǽ, flǽsc, the same sound prolonged, as in a common American pronunciation of bear, hair, there. After 1100 the short æ was generally replaced by a (though sometimes by e); the long ǽ continued to be written æ in the 12th and early 13th c., the OE. eá passing into the same sound and symbol, but in the development of ME. this symbol died out, and was replaced by simple e or ee. Thus OE. sǽ, flǽsc, eár, eást are in Ormin and Layamon sæ, flæssh, ær, æst, but afterwards se(e, flesh, ere, eest. The symbol æ, which thus disappeared from the language in 13th c., was re-introduced in 16th c. in forms derived from Latin words with æ, and (this being the Latin symbolization of Greek αι) Greek words in αι; as ædify, æther. But this æ had only an etymological value, and whenever a word became thoroughly English, the æ or ae was changed into simple e as edify, ether. The æ or ae now remains, only (1) in Greek and Lat. proper names as in Æneas, Cæsar; even these, when familiar, often take e as Judea, Etna. (2) in words belonging to Roman or Gr. Antiquities as ædile, ægis. (3) in scientific or technical terms as ætiology, æstivation, phænogamous, Athenæum; these also when they become popularized take e, as phenomenon, Lyceum, museum, era.

Æ initial is thus to be looked upon as an earlier spelling of E, and will here occur only (1) in EE. words that became obsolete, before changing to e, as æ law (OE. ǽ), æ river (OE. eá); (2) in words directly adopted or formed from Latin and Greek which became obsolete before changing to e as ædituate; or have not changed to e because they indicate ancient things as ædile, ægis, or are technical as ægilops, ægrotant, ætiology. All other words will be found under their later form in E.

In many modern books the digraph æ is regularly resolved as ae; when this is done, dissyllabic ae ought to be printed aë: thus either ægis, aereal, or aegis, aëreal; but simple ae is often used in both.

As to pronunciation usage differs. The analogy of the language, the practice of orthoepists, and the alternate spelling with e, are in favour of æ being treated precisely like e in the same position. But there is a strong tendency with classical scholars (at variance with their practice as to other long L. and Gr. vowels) to make it long (i:) in all positions. This influences popular usage to some extent, so long as æ is written; as soon as e takes its place, natural English habits prevail: cf. æstivate, æstuary, estuary.

ae (e:), mod.Sc. form of northern ME. a, OE. án, one, used adjectively. See A adj.[1]

In ME. and early Sc., a was used bef. a cons., an, ane, bef. a vowel, and absolutely; in mid.Sc. ane was used in all positions and constructions; in mod.Sc. ae (the Sc. spelling of final a long) is used bef. a sb. however beginning, ane only absolutely: 'he has ae hand, only ane.'

æ-, pref. The stress form of OE. a- (see A- pref. 1) used with sbs. and adjs., the unaccented a- being used with verbs. Meaning: out, off, onward, away; hence, from idea of doing away, a privative = un-, -less. Thus æ-fyrmðа washings off, ablutions, æ-gilde without payment, æ-mód out of his mind, æ-scære unshorn, without tonsure, æ-rist arising, æ-cumba what is combed off, oakum. Only a few examples survived in ME. as e-rede unadvised, æ-rist, a-rist rise. The West Germ. dialects had two forms answering to Goth. us- (ur-): viz. OHG. ur-, OE. or- with sbs. and adjs.; OHG. ar-, er-, ir-, mod.G. er-, OE. ar- (rarely preserved), a- with vbs., æ- with sbs. and adjs. This æ- represented an earlier ā- for ar- ('æmód = 'âmód = 'armód, like stræte = WGer. strâte). Ær- reappears in Layamon in ær-wene, ær-witte (where it may be due to a mixture of OE. æ- and or-).

-æ.(-i:) pl. suffix of L. nouns of 1st decl. in -a, and romanized form of Gr. -αι pl. of nouns in -ē, -a, -ēs, -as. Retained in Eng. in words not naturalized or merely in technical use, as alæ, laminæ, larvæ, nebulæ, striæ. Esp. in proper names of cl. antiquity, as Heraclidæ, and modern names of orders and families of animals and plants as Felidæ, Falconidæ, Geometridæ, Leguminosæ, Rosaceæ, Rosidæ, Roseæ. In other words it varies with the Eng. form in -as, as actiniæ or actinias; or is retained only in technical senses as mathematical formulæ, theological formulas. In all words thoroughly popularized it yields to -s, as in arenas, areas, auroras, hyænas, fuchsias, calceolarias, Floras, Faunas, Julias, Marias, Cleopatras, the two Americas.

æsthete ('ɛsθi:t, 'i:sθi:t). [ad. Gr. αἰσθητής one who perceives; cf. athlete.] One who professes a special appreciation of what is beautiful, and endeavours to carry his ideas of beauty into practical manifestation. Cf. ÆSTHETIC a. 4 and sb. 3.

æsthetic (ɛs'θɛtɪk: see below), a. and sb. Also esthetic. [mod. ad. Gr. αἰσθητικ-ός, of or pertaining to αἰσθητά, things perceptible by the senses, things material (as opposed to νοητά things thinkable or immaterial), also 'perceptive, sharp in the senses'; f. vb. stem αἰσθε- 'feel, apprehend by the senses'. Applied in Germ. by Baumgarten (1750–58, Æsthetica) to 'criticism of taste' considered as a science or philosophy; against which, as a misuse of the word found in German only, protest was made by Kant (1781, Crit. R.V. 21), who applied the name, in accordance with the ancient distinction of αἰσθητά and νοητά, to 'the science which treats of the conditions of sensuous perception,' a sense retained in the Kantian philosophy, and found in English c 1800. But Baumgarten's use of æsthetik found popular acceptance, and appeared in Eng. after 1830, though its adoption was long opposed. (See below.) Recent extravagances in the adoption of a sentimental archaism as the ideal of beauty have still further removed æsthetic and its derivatives from their etymological and purely philosophical meaning. 'The pronunciations (ɛs'θɛtɪk, i:s'θɛtɪk, ɛs'θi:tɪk, i:s'θi:tɪk), are all in use; the second is at present most common in London' (N.E.D., 1884).]

¶ The following quotations illustrate the history of the word:

1832 Penny Cycl. I. 156 Æsthetics (Æsthetik) is the designation given by German writers to a branch of philosophical inquiry, the object of which is a philosophical theory of the beautiful. 1832 Philol. Museum 369 Beautiful and ugly depend on principles of taste, which it would be very convenient to designate by an adjective .. Some English writers have adopted the term esthetical. This has not however yet become an established English word .. Perception in general is something very different from that peculiar and complex modification of it which takes cognizance of the beauties of poetry and art. Esthetics would naturally designate the doctrine of perception in general, and might be wanted as a technical term for that purpose. By the Kantian school, indeed, esthetic is used to denote that branch of metaphysics which contains the laws of perception .. As an additional reason for hesitating before we adopt esthetic, it may be noticed that even in Germany it is not yet established beyond contest. 1842 GWILT Encycl. Architect. 673 There has lately grown into use in the arts a silly pedantic term under the name of Æsthetics .. it is however one of the metaphysical and useless additions to nomenclature in the arts in which the German writers abound. 1859 SIR W. HAMILTON Lect. Metaph. I. vii. 124 It is nearly a century since Baumgarten .. first applied the term Æsthetic to the doctrine which we vaguely and periphrastically denominate the Philosophy of Taste, the theory of the Fine Arts, the Science of the Beautiful, etc., —and this term is now in general acceptation, not only in Germany, but throughout the other countries of Europe. The term Apolaustic would have been a more appropriate designation.

It seems likely that the original sense in Welsh and Irish was 'river animal' which by extension came also to mean 'water sprite'. In 14th c. both were a fer, and the force of the of being thus lost except in special connexion, the combination from a far took the place of the earlier feorran, of feor, a fer; and a fer = on-feor began to be strengthened with a following off.
